The battlefield was a furnace, and men were sparks flung into the wind. Cannons coughed like thunderous beasts, spitting fire that chewed the earth into craters. The sky, once blue, now wore a cloak of smoke, as if night had descended early to watch the carnage.
Steel clashed against steel, a symphony of screams and shattering shields. The river nearby ran red, a mirror of the warriors' fury, while the ground drank greedily, a thirsty god demanding sacrifice.
Fear slithered through the ranks like a serpent, coiling around hearts, yet courage stood tall, a stubborn oak refusing to bow to the storm. Every soldier was both predator and prey, lion and lamb, hero and shadow.
The war itself seemed alive, a monstrous puppeteer pulling strings of flesh and bone, laughing as hope was torn like paper in the rain. And still, amid the chaos, banners fluttered like wounded birds, whispering of kingdoms that might rise from the ashes—or be buried beneath them forever.
